RESEARCH INTERESTS

My peregrinations in the political science discipline have taken me from rational choice experimental projects to interpretive methodologies and their attendant evaluative criteria and standards. Having completed our book on Interpretive Research Design and a second edition of Interpretation and Method (first published in 2006, ME Sharpe), Professor Dvora Yanow and I are now focused on co-editing the Routledge Series on Interpretive Methods. My current research projects concern analysis of the implications of human subjects protection policy for social science and the humanities.

SERVICE

Service to the profession

American Political Science Association Ad Hoc Committee on Human Subjects Research January 2017-April 2020. Appointed by then President David Lake, this 11-person committee was charged with articulating ethical principles for research with human subjects.

Resistance to “Research Transparency” Movement

Designed for quantitative, positivist research, I have been part of the resistance to extension of “Data access and research transparency” (DA-RT) to qualitative and interpretive work. That has included one research article documenting the evolution of DA-RT, appearances on many roundtables, and detailed comments on 8 of the 12 draft Community Transparency Statements produced through the Qualitative Transparency Deliberations.

Comment filed on the Notice for Proposed Rulemaking (NPRM); Federal Register (September 8, 2015); ID Docket HHS–OPHS–2015–0008

This NPRM requested comments regarding proposed changes to the regulations for protecting human subjects in research, as set forth in 45CFR46, Subpart A (the “Common Rule”). On January 6, 2016, together with Dvora Yanow and Daniel Levin, I submitted a 10-page comment on the proposed elimination of the exemption for public officials—a proposed revision that could dramatically affect research in the political science discipline.

Comment filed on the Advanced Notice for Proposed Rulemaking (ANPRM); Federal Register (July 26, 2011); ID Docket HHSOPHS20110005

This ANPRM requested comments regarding current regulations for protecting human subjects in research, as set forth in 45CFR46, Subpart A (the “Common Rule”). On October 26, 2011, together with Dvora Yanow, I submitted a three page overview as well as responses to over 60 of the 75 questions posed in the ANPRM. Our concern with Institutional Review Board policy is that the review process fails to fit the needs of the needs of field researchers, broadly, and of political scientists more specifically, who often study powerful elites or other experts, topics that raise particular concerns vis a vis ethical practices.
